The Grub-ſtreet Journal. NUMB. 240.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 1, 1734.

To Mr. BAVIUS, Secretary to the Society of Grub-ſtreet.

SIR,

IT is a very juſt obſervation, that that there is no part of hiſtory which affords more pleaſure, than the accounts of virtuous men, labouring under misfortunes with equanimity and reſignation. Education will make a man deſpiſe death; as appears from thoſe northern nations, which, as Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE obſerves, had an opinion, that 'all 'who gave themſelves up to warlike actions and enterprizes, to the conqueſt of their neighbours, and the 'ſlaughter of their enemies, and died in battle, or of 'violent deaths upon bold adventures or reſolutions, went 'immediately to the vaſt hall or palace of ODIN, their 'god of war; where they were entertained in perpetual 'feaſts and mirth, carowſing every man, in bowls made 'of the ſculls of their enemies they had ſlain, according 'to which numbers, every one in theſe manſions of 'pleaſure was the moſt honoured and the beſt entertained'. The like principle we find inculcated by MAHOMET; to which, in a great meaſure, is to be attributed all his glory and greatneſs.

In a country, where death is generally eſteemed the greateſt of evils, it muſt be the energy of a ſuperior and exalted reaſon, that can conquer a prejudice for the moſt part imbibed in the very dawn of our lives. And tho' my lord BACON's obſervation in ſome meaſure be true, 'That there is no paſſion in the mind of man ſo weak, 'but what can maſter the fear of death, as revenge triumphs over death, love ſlights it, honour aſpireth to 'it, and grief flyeth to it'; yet to receive death as a matter wholly indifferent, or to conſider it like ATTICUS, as a thing that he knew muſt be, and therefore the ſooner it happened, the better, this is a caſe which is very rarely the product of human philoſophy. The true ſource of moſt men's courage, is the hopes of eſcaping. REGULUS indeed went to certain death for the good of his country: but that elevated ſtrain of vertue ſeems to have been long extinguiſhed. Nay, ſome have doubted, and not altogether without foundation, whether there ever was ſuch a man as REGULUS.

There are, 'tis true, ſeveral remarkable relations in hiſtory, of men who have preſerved their uſual calmneſs and temper to the laſt moment of their lives. The manner, in which the celebrated LUCAN ſubmitted to his fate, is very memorable. The tyrant NERO having indulged him ſo far as to let him chuſe the kind of death he thought moſt eaſy, he ordered the arteries of his legs and arms to be opened in a hot bath; but before he underwent the operation, he ſupped with his friends, and behaved with all his wonted good humour and chearfulneſs; and when he was juſt fainting away, he repeated a paſſage out of his own Pharſalia, with as much grace as if he had been making an oration in public. And by the account we have of our own country-man Sir THOMAS MOOR, we find he retained his accuſtomed pleaſantry even to the executioner, when he was upon the point of doing his office.

It is not a very uncommon thing, for people in their laſt wills to treat death in a very unconcerned and merry manner. One gentleman, after enumerating a great many obligations he had to a friend, bequeaths him ten thouſand —— thanks. —— Another, who was a covetous old fellow, and wanted to have his will drawn with skill and accuracy, without paying for it, contrived the following expedient. He ſent for a very eminent lawyer, and having given the neceſſary inſtructions, deſired him, with a great many expreſſions of eſteem, to put in an article of a 100 l. for himſelf. When the will was finiſhed, a fee was offered, but refuſed, as may be eaſily gueſſed. In ſhort, the lawyer's back was no ſooner turned, than the will was new copied over, and the 100 l. legacy left out. And this ſly trick put upon one of the long robe, has made the whole order ever ſince obſerve it as an inviolable maxim, never to refuſe a fee on the like occaſion, from the neareſt friend or relation in the world.

Inſtances of humours diſpoſed to drollery in the like circumſtances are very numerous: of which the following is a very extraordinary one, never yet made public; and which, if you think proper to publiſh, cannot fail, I believe, of giving your readers an agreeable entertainment. — It is the will of H—Y D——F, Eſq; of the county of Lancaſter, who dyed laſt February.

IN the name of God, amen. I H— D—— of —— &c. being ſound both in body and mind (bleſſed be God) do therefore think this the beſt and propereſt time of making my laſt will and teſtament. For, as I have no great notion of a man's underſtanding being very perfect, at a time that his body is weak and indiſpoſed; and as a great part of what I have to diſpoſe of, will be found valuable in proportion to the ſalubrity of my intellectuals; I think myſelf under an obligation of ſwerving at this conjuncture from the uſage of mankind, and of declaring my will, at a ſeaſon, in which I find both body and mind influenced by the utmoſt vigour and ſanity. In the name therefore of that one eternal God, who created all things, and from whom all wiſdom is derived, I do this twenty-fourth day of December, 1733, declare, make, and publiſh my will in the manner following.

Imprimis. I leave my body, as a very wholſome feaſt to the worms inhabiting the vault of my family: to whom I acknowledge myſelf extreamly indebted for eating up my anceſtors; particularly, for their kindneſs in demoliſhing an old teſty father, who left me at his death 50,000 l. though he was very near upon ſtarving me during his life.

Item. To all practiſing ſollicitors and attorneys I bequeath the following proverb, viz. Honeſty is the beſt policy. — And this legacy I chuſe to give to thoſe worthy gentlemen; it being the only one I could think of, for which I could be ſure they would not quarrel.

Item. To the kings of England, and all other of God's vice-gerents, I leave the following interpretation of that maxim in our law, ſo often quoted for the ſupport of arbitrary power, viz. The king can do no wrong: and this I interpret to import only, that the king can have no juſt prerogative to do any injury or wrong to his ſubjects.

Item. To all married women I bequeath cleanlineſs.

Item. To all married men I bequeath the ſame good quality; as likewiſe the utmoſt decency of behaviour and expreſſion, at leaſt in the preſence of their wives and daughters.

Item. To all coquets, within the cities of London and Weſtminſter, I leave deſpair, rotten reputations, and the contempt of every man of ſenſe.

Item. To all prudes within the cities aforeſaid, I from my ſoul bequeath virginity and wrinkles: or, if they prefer having a baſtard by their father's butler, groom, or coachman; or any other butler, groom, &c. I deſire my executors may give them their choice.

Item. To the parliament of Great Britain, I leave all eccleſiaſtical courts; and hope an act will ſoon paſs for the purging them effectually.

Item. To the parliament of Great Britain, I leave the reformation of all the courts at Weſtminſter-hall, vulgarly called Courts of juſtice.

Item. To the aforeſaid parliament, I leave the conſideration, when it will be convenient to eſtabliſh annual parliaments; and whether there can poſſibly be a properer conjuncture than the preſent.

Item. To the armies of Great Britain and Ireland, I leave all the bad roads to be mended; and when that is done, I leave them to the parliament for the ſame purpoſe.

Item. To the R—— R— the B——s, I give all due praiſe, for their contempt of worldly grandeur; their glorious unanimity in the legiſlative ſphere they act in; their diſintereſted care of Chriſt's church; and their lively hopes of being ſoon tranſlated to a better ſtate.

Item. To the parſon of my pariſh, the rev. Mr. C——, and all other parſons, I leave the following piece of advice: That they would not any longer expoſe their own weakneſs and abſurdity, by attempting to explain things, which are myſteries, and conſequently incomprehenſible, and above all explanation; and that, inſtead of tireing their congregations with what they call demonſtrations, they would be pleaſed to inforce the practice of that refined ſyſtem of morality, which our lord Jeſus Chriſt came down from heaven to deliver to mankind.

Item. To C—Y C——R, Eſq; I leave a paſtoral farce call'd Love in a riddle; as likewiſe all his New-year and Birth-day odes: and I ſeriouſly intreat him to preſerve them with a religious care; for if he does not; I verily believe no-body elſe will.

Item. To the authors of the London Journal, and the paper called the Free Briton, I leave one ounce of modeſty, to be divided equally between them. I ſhould have been more munificent in this bequeſt, were I not well convinced, that one ounce will be found more than they'll ever make uſe of.

Item. I leave the whole tribe of polite coxcombs in and about London, to ſharpers, ſurgeons, the pox, and their taylors.

Item. To S. H— S——, B. preſident of the college of man-ſlayers, I leave a curious Norway ſpider, with a hundred legs, and nine pair of eyes; as likewiſe my whole collection of ſhells, butterflies, &c.

Laſtly, To my three brothers, THOMAS, HENRY, and JOHN, I leave my whole eſtate real and perſonal; to be divided equally amongſt them, ſhare and ſhare alike. And my will is, that if ever they marry, they ſhould not ſettle one farthing pin money on their wives; nor more on their eldeſt ſons, than juſt a proportion to their wive's fortunes. — And I make and ordain my ſaid brothers, THOMAS, HENRY, and JOHN, the executors of this my will; to ſee the ſame performed, as far as lies in their power, according to my true intent and meaning. —— In witneſs whereof, I, &c.

A Continuation of The Critical Review of the publick buildings, &c. examined, by Mr. HIRAM.

XI. 'THE Royal Exchange is the next ſtructure 'of conſequence which demands our attention; wherein, ſays our Critic, 'There is 'ſomething to blame, and ſomething to admire'. pag. 10. But what thoſe two kinds of ſomethings are, he has not thought proper, or was not able to tell us. But however, he adds, That 'a building of that extent, 'grandeur and elevation, ought to have had an ample 'area before it'. This obſervation is undoubtedly right, if ſuch could have been had: but as it could not in that part of the city, the remark is nothing to the purpoſe.

'The entrance into this building, ſays he, is very 'grand and auguſt'; but what produces that grandeur and auguſtneſs, he has not declared. 'The two ſtatues 'of CHARLES the I. and II. [made by the late ingenious 'Mr. BUSHNEL] he ſays, are in a particular manner 'beautiful and admirable'. But whether in the anatomy, or the drapery, the ſpectator is left to diſcover: who, if he view them intently, muſt perceive that the latter is moſt exquiſitely fine, as being like real ſilk itſelf.

The turret, which Mr. Critic calls a tower, and would have reduced to one half of its preſent height, is, in my opinion, much too low. Had it been carried higher, and finiſhed with a ſpire, of a gradual diminution, it would have made a much finer figure, amongſt the other lofty buildings, when viewed at a diſtance. Indeed, I muſt own, his obſervations on the many breaks of its angles, to be juſt; and whoever was the deſigner, he had very little knowledge in architecture.

The front of the Royal Exchange conſiſts of two kinds of orders, viz. The middle part at the entrance of Corinthian, which is really magnificent; and the extreams of Compoſite, which is of poor and mean aſpect, compared with the former: and as this is a great abſurdity, 'tis but reaſonable I ſhould explain it, that for the future the like may be avoided. —— The middle part conſiſts of four large Corinthian columns, ſupporting their entablatures and pediments, which have a noble aſpect; but had they been elevated, on a ruſticated baſis, about three feet in height, they would have preſented themſelves with much greater majeſty and elegancy. But this our Critic could not ſee. —— The wings on each ſide of Compoſite order, computing the total height of the columns with their entablature, are not equal to half the height of the Corinthian order in front: and as we ſee the great and ſmall columns in one range, at the ſame time; the ſmall Compoſite makes a moſt terrible figure, in compariſon with the Corinthian, which is large and magnificent.

To have made this front truly magnificent, the large entablature of the pediments ſhould have been continued throughout the whole length of the front, ſupported by pillaſters, equal in diameter to the front columns; from whoſe impoſts, arches might have been turned with much greater elegancy and magnificence than the preſent are. —— And indeed, if the Compoſite frontiſpieces, againſt the two niches, were taken away; and the niches themſelves made plain and larger; the two figures would appear with more majeſty. For the ſmall columns, with their broken pediments, being ſeen and considered with the large columns at the same time, make a poor, low, and miserable appearance.

'Tis something remarkable, that our Critic should commend the inside of this building, and find no fault with any thing, except the statues there. 'The inside 'is light and airy, laid out in a very good stile, and fi-'nished with great propriety of decoration'. —— In the 1st. place, The piazza, which environs the area, is of Doric columns, sustaining architraved arches, finely enriched, and which have an elegant aspect. Over this Doric order are placed Ionic pillasters on pedestals, whereby their diameters are rendered too small, (as has been observed at the Custom-house); and the intercolumnations being much too great for their diameter, the whole makes a very poor figure, as if the architect would have done something, but knew not how. To compleat this most terrible part, he has introduced imposts, and from them turned elliptical arches (caused by the very great intercolumnation) which look more proper to contain the furniture of a king's kitchen chimney, than his statue in a niche.

XII. The entrance into the new Bank, would undoubtedly have a better effect, could it be seen at a greater distance than the breadth of Threadneedle-street. But as that cannot easily be obtained, it must be dispensed with. 'As to the structure itself, our Critic says, 'tis 'grand and expensive; the architect has a very good 'taste of beauty, and only seems to be rather too fond 'of decoration: this appears pretty eminently by the 'weight of his cornices, which appear, in my opinion, 'to be rather too heavy for the building'.——Here our Critic has at once demonstrated his ignorance in architecture; for those cornices, which he thinks are too heavy, are truly of proper dimensions according to the order to which they belong. That which makes him think so, is, the architect has wisely continued his whole entablature throughout, in one part; whereby its architrave freeze, and cornice have a bold majestic projection. But had this architect broke back his entablature over the capital of each column, unto the upright of the building (as is most scandalously done in the frontispiece to the Meuse, the Banquetting-house at White-hall, the gate of lord BURLINGTON's in Piccadilly, and many other supposed fine buildings in London, (more of which in their places,) I suppose, its mean aspect would have been in the elegant taste of our Critic. —— But how much is he mistaken in real terms, when he says, 'This architect 'is rather too fond of decoration, as appears by his cor-'nices being too heavy for the building'! By decorations, I think, carved mouldings, festoons, foliages, compartments, &c. are generally understood, and not heavy disproportioned cornices, as he most injudiciously supposes these to be. In short, had the architect made the rustics in the basement of larger dimensions, they would have been more agreeable to the simple beauty of the upper story, than they now are; being, in my humble opinion, much too small, and, which at a distance would appear more like courses of large bricks, than massy stone.

From the PEGASUS in Grub-street.

IN our 230th Journal, May 23. we published a letter from an unknown correspondent, under the name of ATTICUS, containing a banter upon the author of The Critical Review of the publick buildings, &c. for having projected an OCTANGULAR QUADRANGLE or SQUARE. This letter provoked him to give on June 1. a malicious, false, and scandalous historical account of our Paper; on supposition, that ATTICUS was not an occasional correspondent, but a constant author in it. Had both this supposition, and the account occasioned by it been true, they could not have been the least vindication of this MAN OF TASTE, from the imputation of a notorious blunder, a contradiction in terms, which he could not deny. That the former part of his account of our Paper was false, has been particularly shewn already, as the remaining part may perhaps be shewn hereafter, if we think it worth while: and that his supposition was false, he has himself acknowledged, by publishing lately some silly Queries; wherein he endeavours to fix the letter signed ATTICUS upon a certain person, printing the initial and final letters of his name. As to change a dispute about any point of learning, &c. into a personal controversy, is the usual method of those, who are not able to defend the absurd or immoral things they have advanced: so the disputants at Billings-gate constantly run off from the point in debate, into historical accounts of the life and converſation of each other. And tho' this gentleman had expreſſed the greateſt indignation at being mentioned in the ſame ſentence with the authors of the Hyp-Doctor and the Bee; yet he has exactly followed their example in the management of their controverſies with us; endeavouring, like them, to expoſe the real names of his antagoniſts; and, in his account of our Journal, throwing out that very ſpittle, which he had licked up from their fictitious narratives.

This gentleman aſſured the publick, June 8, that from that time he would take no farther notice of the Grub-ſtreet Journal; for which he gave this reaſon, that his undertaking having the approbation of the town, the authors would only hurt themſelves in their endeavours to wound him.—On June 13, in our 233d Journal, it was thought proper to take this great connoiſſeur to task for his audacious attack upon Signior AMICONI; whoſe paintings he had abſolutely condemned, as 'only calculated to 'pleaſe at a glance, having no ſolidity in them, being ſuch, 'as of courſe would not bear an examination'. This ſentence he had endeavoured to juſtify, by an examination of the four pictures in the ſtair-caſe of Powis-houſe; the ſubjects of which he affirmed to be JUDITH's return from the murder of HOLOFERNES, The banquet of ANTONY and CLEOPATRA, The meeting of DAVID and ABIGAIL, and The out-ſet of the morning. Theſe he took to be the ſubjects of theſe pieces; as repreſenting thoſe ſubjects he examined and condemned them all; and gave very particular rules how two of them ought to have been drawn. —— In anſwer to all this, we demonſtrated, that this gentleman did not ſo much as know the ſubjects of theſe pieces; but had actually miſtaken three out of four; the three laſt being The banquet in HOLOFERNES' tent, The introduction of JUDITH to him, and The four ſeaſons of the year.

Tho' this juſtly expoſed him to the laughter of the town; yet, without taking the leaſt notice of our Paper, he proceeded very gravely, on June 15, with the air of a great maſter in architecture and painting, to criticize upon the building and pictures of Montague-houſe. —— He kept this ſuperior air on June 22, when he begun his obſervations upon Greenwich Hoſpital; but condeſcended however to tell us, that we had 'only been po-'ſitive and preſuming; that we knew nothing of the 'art we pretended to defend; that our criticiſms were 'low, trifling, and ridiculous; that he ſhould reduce 'himſelf to our level if he continued the debate; and 'that, according to his promiſe, he would take no far-'ther pains to expoſe us': tho' he had held no debate with us, nor ſayed any thing for himſelf in anſwer to our objections for three weeks.

In our 235th Journal we returned an anſwer to this; and called upon him, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to act like an honeſt man, by either retracting or defending what he had advanced. Being aſhamed to do the one, and unable to do the other, and ſtill affecting to ſhew a contempt for us, he had the aſſurance, on June 29, to impute all his miſtakes and blunders to the obſcurity of Signior AMICONI's paintings; and the folly to lay down theſe two aſſertions, 'That an hiſtorical picture ought to be drawn 'in ſuch a manner as to be underſtood at firſt ſight by e-'very body; and That a man, who does not know what 'the ſubject of a picture is, may yet reaſon very well 'upon the manner in which it is drawn'. Tho' theſe poſitions could not but appear ridiculous to any one of common underſtanding; yet to ſhew our fairneſs in controverſy, we, in two ſucceeding Journals, anſwered every word he had ſayed in ſupport of them. Inſtead of making the leaſt reply, he went on boldly and blindly criticizing and cenſuring the paintings at Greenwich Hoſpital.

After all this affected contempt, long ſilence in his own defence, and repeated promiſes not to break it, one could not well imagine, that this great Critic would have vouchſafed at laſt to begin a kind of formal vindication of himſelf againſt us. And yet this he did on the 13th inſtant, a month after we had demanded ſatisfaction in behalf of Signior AMICONI. This literary out-let, or ſhed of a vindication, this grand architect has been raiſing for three weeks together: having layed the foundation upon ſuch ſtuff, as overturns all his batteries againſt the credit of our Journal; and compoſed the ſuperſtructure of the rotten materials of a ruinous houſe in Grub-ſtreet, the chief property of a ſanguine, learned, oriental printer; which, tho' ſunk a quarter of its uſual rent, and frequently advertiſed to be either ſold or lett a penny-worth, no-body was ſo imprudent, as either to buy or hire.

BAVIUS.

An ODE on the marriage of the duke of PORTLAND, and lady MARGARET HARLEY.

1.
Leader of the nuptial band,
  Hither, HYMEN, quickly move;
In thy porch the lovers ſtand,
  Full of wiſhes, full of love;
HYMEN, HYMEN, haſte away,
Join their hands, nor let 'em ſtay.

2.
HARLEY fair by PORTLAND led,
  She ſole child of learning's friend,
He in ſchool of honour bred,
  Panting at thy gates attend:
HYMEN, HYMEN, haſte away,
Join their hands, nor let 'em ſtay.

3.
Lo the portals open wide,
  To receive the welcome gueſt;
Happy bridegroom, happy bride!
  Bleſſing, in each other bleſs'd!
Guard them, HYMEN, and ſecure
Pleaſures which may long endure.

4.
Never, never may they riſe,
  But to meet a cheerful day;
May the minutes to their eyes,
  Seem to fly too faſt away.
Guard them, HYMEN, and ſecure
Pleaſures which may long endure.

5.
Ever ſtrangers to their bed,
  Be reproach and wakeful care;
When the veil of night is ſpread,
  Let content be poſted there.
Guard them, HYMEN, and ſecure
Pleaſures which may long endure.

6.
Fair and many be their days,
  Many be their joys and free:
Such as may not ſoil their praiſe;
  Virtue may not bluſh to ſee.
Guard them, HYMEN, and ſecure
Pleaſures which may long endure.

7.
On a brave and lovely race
  May the tender parents ſmile;
Where we may their lineage trace,
  Ornaments of Britain's iſle.
Guard them, Hymen, and ſecure
Pleaſures which may long endure.

8.
May (the heighth of all deſire!)
  When this ſcene of life is o'er,
Both without a pain retire,
  Where the virtuous went before.
HYMEN, HYMEN, yield the pair
To the pow'r that made 'em fair.
